

About Spiral Atlas Games

Spiral Atlas Games are an Australian solo indie games studio run by Sean (they/them), a former mathematician turned game dev.

I'll switch to first person now since it feels a little silly to call myself "we" or "they" ;)

I make the kind of games I wish I saw more of in the world. A common thread is a wry sense of humour and gentle satire or social commentary, grounded in a sincere investment in my characters and their stories. And as a non-binary wheelchair user, I realised the only way I'd see people like me in games is if I made my own. In general, I aim to make my games queer, diverse, and accessible.

I also create and share tutorials and assets to help other game developers and artists, such as pay what you want backgrounds, Blender models, and a sprite creator:

I write, code, and make all my own sprite and background art. I draw upon my background in mathematics to create procedural objects in Blender for my backgrounds, like editable curtains made using sine waves.

I do get some help here and there from other people. Most notably: I use other people's music since that's one form of creativity I never had any skill for, and my partner takes care of all the fiddly parts involved in uploading to Steam.
